Some people say that statements such as she's younger than me are wrong and that the correct form is she's younger than I. This is based on the fact that than is a conjunction and so the personal pronoun is still in the subject position even though there is no verb (in full it would be she's younger than I am). Yet for most people the supposed 'correct' form does not sound natural and it is mainly found in very formal writing; it is usually perfectly acceptable to say she's younger than me.

Effective English

This section of the dictionary has been specially written to provide practical help in writing good English. It aims to help you improve your basic skills and to write well in a variety of situations, enabling you to create a good impression and to get your message across effectively. It is organized into two main sections:

- Brush up your English is a quick-reference guide to basic aspects of the language. It gives straightforward advice about grammar and punctuation, together with guidance on choosing the most suitable vocabulary and level of English for different types of writing. It also provides a handy list of words that are frequently confused with each other.
- Practical writing shows you how to put basic English skills into practice in everyday situations, both at work and at home. There are sections on applying for a job, writing at work (for example, writing reports or memos), and general correspondence (such as writing letters of complaint and making insurance claims). There is also a section offering guidelines for writing emails.

Section 1
Brush up your English

Introduction

This section provides a guide to the basic features and levels of English and gives advice about how to write clearly and effectively. You may feel that you are confident in one area of English (e.g. grammar) but that you need to brush up your knowledge in another (e.g. punctuation). The information in this section is presented in a way that enables you to refer quickly to the particular aspect or aspects on which you need guidance. There are two main parts, each of which are divided into several sections, each dealing with different language topics.

1.1 Essentials of grammar and punctuation

Grammar and punctuation are important: they can make all the difference between a piece of writing that is clear and effective and one that is confusing or conveys a bad impression to the reader.

This section is divided into two main parts:

- ▶ Grammar 3
- ▶ Punctuation 12

▶ Grammar

Grammar is the way in which words are put together to form sentences: a good grasp of grammar is essential if you want to write well. This section has three main units: Parts of speech; Sentences and clauses; and Agreement.

Parts of speech (word classes)

Words can be classified into categories called 'parts of speech' (or 'word classes') according to their function in a sentence. The main parts of speech in English are: noun, verb, adjective, adverb, pronoun, preposition, conjunction, exclamation, and determiner.

Nouns

A noun is a word that names someone or something: a person (woman, boy, nurse), a thing (dog, building, tree), or an idea, quality, or state (truth, birth, happiness). A common noun names things generally, while a proper noun is a name that identifies a particular person, place, or thing (Steven, Europe, the Second World War) and begins with a capital letter.

Collective nouns, such as audience, family, herd, government, team, are nouns which refer to groups of people or things. They can be treated as singular or plural, with either a singular or plural verb (the whole family was at the table or the whole family were at the table). For more information about this, see the section on Agreement on page 10.

Verbs

A verb describes what a person or thing does or what happens (such as run, follow, or grow) or a state (such as be). The basic form of a verb, which often appears with the word 'to', is called the infinitive (e.g. to run, to be).

The tense of a verb tells you when a person did something or when something existed or took place. In English, the main tenses are the present (I am, she laughs, they like), the past (I was, she laughed, they liked), and the future (I shall, she will laugh, they will like). Other forms of the past tense are formed with the help of verbs known as auxiliary verbs (e.g. was, have, had: he was laughing; I had been; they have arrived).

When the action of a verb affects a person or thing, the verb is called transitive. The person or thing affected by a verb is known as the object (for example the word fire in we lit a fire, or my mother in I admired my mother). If the verb does not have an object, it is called intransitive (e.g. she smiled or my head hurts).

Active and passive

Depending on the way in which you word a sentence, a verb can be either active or passive. All verbs have a subject, which is the person or thing which comes before the verb. For example, France is the subject of France beat Brazil in the final.

When the verb is active (beat in this example) the subject of the verb is doing the action. The person or thing affected by the verb (here, Brazil) is called the object, as described above.

When the verb is passive, the subject undergoes the action:

Brazil were beaten by France in the final.

Here, Brazil has become the subject of the passive verb were beaten. The passive is often used in more formal writing, such as reports or official documents: there is more information about this in the section on Formal language on page 21.

Participles

A participle is a word formed from a verb and used to make compound verb tenses such as the present continuous (she is laughing) and the past perfect (she had laughed) with the auxiliary verbs described earlier. Participles can also be used as adjectives (burnt toast*) or nouns (*good breeding).

There are two kinds of participle in English:

- the present participle, which ends with -ing (*we are going)
- the past participle, which ends with -d or -ed for regular verbs (have you decided?) and with -t or -en (*new houses are being built; my watch is broken) or some other form for irregular ones. Irregular verbs do not follow the normal rules when forming their different tenses: this dictionary always shows irregular forms in the verb's main entry.

Participles are often used to introduce less important or 'subordinate' clauses (see page 9 for more on Clauses) where the participle is attached to other words in a sentence, e.g.

Her mother,	opening the door quietly,	came into the room.
[subject]	[subordinate clause]

Here, you can see that the subordinate clause refers to the subject of the sentence (her mother) and the sentence makes sense. Take care to avoid 'dangling' participles, when the participle does not refer to the noun to which it is attached, normally the subject of the sentence:

☒ Recently converted into apartments, I passed by the house where I grew up.

In this incorrect example, the sentence technically means that it is 'I' who was 'recently converted into apartments'. You need to make 'the house' the subject of the sentence rather than 'I' so that the participle (converted) matches the subject; a correct form of the sentence would be:

☑ Recently converted into apartments, the house where I grew up was unrecognizable.

Subjunctive

The subjunctive is a special form (or mood) of a verb that expresses a wish or possibility instead of a fact. It has a limited role in English compared to other languages such as French, but it is important to get its use right in formal written contexts:

It was suggested he wait till the next morning.

Her religion decrees that men and women be strictly segregated.

In these sentences, the verbs wait and be are in the subjunctive; the ordinary forms (called the indicative) would be waits and are.

Here are other typical uses of the subjunctive:

- after if, as if, as though, and unless, in sentences that state a hypothetical condition:

  If I were taller, I would have been a model.

- be or were at the beginning of a clause with the subject following:

  Were I to make a list of my favourite films, this would be in second place.

  All books, be they fiction or non-fiction, should provide entertainment in some form or other.

- in certain fixed expressions and phrases, e.g. be that as it may, come what may, perish the thought, and so be it.

Adjectives and adverbs

An adjective is a word, such as sweet, red, or technical, that is used to describe a noun. An adverb is a word, such as gently, lazily, or very, which is typically used to give information about a verb, adjective, or other adverb.

Most adjectives can be used in two positions: either before the noun they describe, where they are called attributive, as in a black cat and a gloomy outlook, or after a verb such as be, become, grow, look, or seem, where they are called predicative, as in *the cat was black and *the outlook looks gloomy.

Adverbs normally come between the subject and its verb, or between an auxiliary verb (such as be or have) and a main verb

She carefully avoided my eye.

Roosevelt's financial policy was roundly criticized in 1933.

But if you want to change the emphasis of a sentence, you can alter the position of an adverb accordingly, as in the following examples:

The student will happily answer any questions.
(i.e. the student will be happy to answer any questions)

The student will answer any questions happily.
(i.e. the student will answer any questions in a happy way)

Happily, the student will answer any questions. [sentence adverb]
(i.e. it is fortunate that the student will answer any questions).

Words in action: split infinitives

Many people think that 'splitting infinitives' (putting an adverb between to and the verb) is wrong. They believe you should say, for example, she used secretly to admire him rather than she used to secretly admire him. But avoiding the split infinitive can sound awkward and can even change the emphasis of what is being said (compare, for example, she seems really to like him with she seems to really like him). Because of this, the rule is not followed as strictly today as it used to be, although it is still best not to split infinitives in formal writing.

Sentence adverbs

Some adverbs (such as clearly, happily, hopefully, thankfully) refer to a whole statement, and indicate the attitude of the speaker or writer rather than relating to what is said. In this role they are called sentence adverbs. Sentence adverbs often stand at the beginning of the sentence:

Unhappily, in 2001, they separated. [sentence adverb]
(i.e. it is unfortunate that they separated in 2001)

Compare this with:

In 2001 they separated unhappily. [adverb]
(i.e. in 2001 they separated in an unhappy way)

Sentence adverbs are well established in English, although the use of thankfully and (in particular) hopefully can arouse controversy:

? Hopefully the road should be finished by June 2007.

Although there is no good reason for viewing this type of sentence as ungrammatical, you should be aware that some people may take exception to the use of hopefully and thankfully as sentence adverbs. In formal written contexts it is generally better to avoid using them in this way.

Pronouns

A pronoun is a word such as I, we, they, me, you, she, or them, and other forms such as the possessive pronouns hers and theirs and the reflexive pronouns myself and themselves. They are used to refer to (and take the place of) a noun that has already been mentioned or is known, especially to avoid repeating the noun:

Kate was tired so she went to bed.

Harris and others like him suffer from Information Fatigue Syndrome.

Personal pronouns

I, we, he, she, and they are subjective pronouns, which means they act as the subjects of verbs. Me, us, him, her, and them are objective pronouns, which means that they act as the objects of verbs and prepositions.

Words in action: I or me?

These two personal pronouns are often used wrongly, usually in sentences in which 'I' is used with another noun. If the pronoun is the subject of the verb, then you should use 'I':

Mira and I had a cup of tea.

If the pronoun is the object of the verb, then you should use 'me':

She nodded at Dad and me.

It's a tiny bit boring, between you and me.

A common mistake in spoken English is to say:

☒ It's a tiny bit boring, between you and I.

This is grammatically incorrect because 'between' is a preposition that should be followed by the objective pronoun 'me'.

TIP: see if the sentence sounds correct if you use the pronoun without the other noun:

☑ I had a cup of tea. ☑ She nodded at me.

☒ Me had a cup of tea. ☒ She nodded at I.

Prepositions

A preposition is a word such as after, in, to, on, and with. Prepositions are generally used in front of nouns or pronouns and they are used to describe:

- the position of something: the cat was under the chair.
- the time when something happens: they arrived on Sunday.
- the way in which something is done: we went by train.

Some people have been taught that a preposition should never come at the end of a sentence. There are some cases, however, when it is impossible (or unnatural) to organize the sentence in a way that would avoid this, for example:

- in passive expressions:
  - ☑ The dress had not even been paid for.
  - ☒ Paid for the dress had not even been.
- in relative clauses and questions featuring verbs with linked adverbs or prepositions:
  - ☑ What did Marion think she was up to?
  - ☒ To what did Marion think she was up?
  - ☑ They must be convinced of the commitment they are taking on
  - ☒ Of the commitment they are taking on they must be convinced.

In modern English, it can be perfectly acceptable to end a sentence with a preposition.

Conjunctions

A conjunction (sometimes also called a connective) is a word such as and, because, but, for, if, or, and when that is used to connect words, phrases, clauses, and sentences.

Other parts of speech

Other parts of speech include exclamations (or interjections) and determiners. An exclamation is a word or phrase expressing greetings or congratulation (e.g. Bravo!) or strong emotion (e.g. Alas!). A determiner is a word like a/an, the, this, those, and every, which you put in front of a noun (as in a cat, the cat, this cat, those cats and every cat). The word the is sometimes known as the 'definite article' and the word a (or an) as the 'indefinite article'.

Sentences and clauses

A sentence is a group of words that makes complete sense, contains a main verb, begins with a capital letter, and ends with a full stop, question mark, or exclamation mark.

I took some money out of the bank.

A clause is a group of words that contains a verb (and usually other components too) and forms part of a sentence:

I went to the bank and took out some money.
[clause] [clause]

Sentences

There are three kinds of sentence:

- a simple sentence normally contains one statement:

  The train should be here soon.

- a compound sentence contains two or more clauses of equal status (main clauses), normally joined by a conjunction such as and or but:

  He became bored with teaching and looked for a new career.
  [clause] [conjunction] [clause]

- a complex sentence is also made up of clauses, but in these sentences the clauses are not equally balanced. They contain a main clause and one or more subordinate clauses:

  The story would make headlines if it ever became public.
  [main clause] [subordinate clause]

  She didn't deserve what he did to her.
  [main clause] [subordinate clause]

Words in action: beginning sentences with and and but

Contrary to what many people think or might have been taught at school, it is not grammatically incorrect to begin a sentence with a conjunction such as and or but. The practice is often employed in literature or speeches for rhetorical effect, e.g. What are the government's chances of winning in court? And what are the consequences? It can also be used to show surprise, e.g. And are you really going? and sometimes just to introduce an improvised afterthought, e.g. I'm going to swim. And don't you dare watch.

Clauses

Here are the main types of clauses:

- a main clause forms part of a compound or complex sentence, but makes sense on its own:

  I went shopping and then I treated myself to lunch.
  [main clause] [main clause]

- a subordinate clause depends on a main clause for its meaning: together with a main clause, a subordinate clause or clauses form part of a complex sentence. Subordinate clauses can be categorized into further types:

  - a conditional clause is one that usually begins with if or unless and describes something that is possible, probable, or hypothetical:

    If it looks like rain, a simple shelter can be made out of a plastic sheet.

[conditional clause] [main clause]

- a relative clause is one connected to a main clause by a word such as which, that, whom, whose, when, where or who:

I first saw her in Paris, [main clause]	where I lived in the early nineties. [relative clause]
She wants to be with Thomas, [main clause]	who is best suited to take care of her. [relative clause]

More about relative clauses: using words like 'who', 'that', and 'which'

Most problems with relative clauses arise from the uncertainty about when you should use that and when you should use which or who. As the following examples show, for much of the time that is interchangeable with either of these words, and it is the usual choice in everyday writing and conversation in British English.

- ☑ It is a film that should be seen by everyone.
- ☑ It is a film which should be seen by everyone.
- ☑ You're the only person who has ever listened to me.
- ☑ You're the only person that has ever listened to me.

However, there are cases when it is not good English to use that. This is related to the fact that there are two types of relative clause:

- restrictive (or defining) relative clause gives essential information about a noun that comes before it. It can be introduced by that, which, who, or whose and does not normally have a comma before it:

She held out the hand	which was hurt.
She held out the hand [main clause]	that was hurt. [restrictive relative clause]

  You can also leave out that or which in some restrictive relative clauses:

  It reminded him of the house that he used to live in.

  It reminded him of the house he used to live in.

- a non-restrictive (or non-defining) relative clause gives extra information that could be left out without affecting the structure or meaning of the sentence. It is normally introduced by which, who, or whose (but never that), and should be preceded by a comma:

She held out her hand, [main clause]	which Rob shook. [non-restrictive relative clause]

  A non-restrictive relative clause should also be followed by a comma if it is in the middle of a sentence:

Bill,	who had fallen asleep, [non-restrictive relative clause]	suddenly roused himself.

Agreement

Agreement is the process of making words match up with each other in a sentence, for example, ensuring that the singular form of a verb accompanies a singular subject. Mostly we do this instinctively, but problems can arise in sentences in certain contexts: for example, is it right to say the government are doing a good job or the government is doing a good job? Here are some guidelines to help you get it right.

Compound subjects

Two nouns joined by and are normally treated as plural and take a plural verb:

Speed and accuracy are top of the list.

But if the two nouns combine to make a phrase that can be regarded as a single unit, they are sometimes treated as singular, even when one of them is plural:

Fish and chips is my favourite meal.

When the subject is a single noun followed by an additional element tagged on by a phrase such as as well as, accompanied by, or together with, then the verb should be singular and not plural, since the singular noun is by itself the true subject:

The little girl, together with her friend Kerry, was busy filling her bucket with sand.
[subject] [singular verb]

Your booking form, accompanied by a cheque, needs to reach us by Monday.
[subject] [singular verb]

One easy way to check the agreement in these cases is to think of the sentence without the extra element: The little girl ...was...; Your booking form ...needs ...

Some expressions can cause uncertainty because they are grammatically ambiguous, for example phrases such as more than one:

More than one dealer has shown an interest in the painting.

Although the meaning above is clearly plural, the grammar remains singular because one is closer to the verb and is also the dominant word in its phrase (you could not say More than one dealer have shown an interest in the painting).

The purchaser gets a licence to work on either or both products.

Here there is a problem of agreement with the following noun: either requires the singular form product, while both requires the plural form products. As both is closer to the noun, it determines the form. In this case, it would be easy to rephrase the sentence and so avoid the problem altogether:

The purchaser gets a licence to work on either or both of the products.

Singular nouns treated as plural

Some singular nouns can be used with either a singular or plural verb. The commonest of these are the collective nouns which stand for a group or collection of people or things. These include words such as audience, committee, crew, family, government, group, team, and many others.

The general rule with words like these is to treat them as singular when the emphasis is on the group as a whole and as plural when the emphasis is on the individuals that form the group:

A group of lads was gathered around the pub. (singular)
The jury retired to consider their verdict. (plural)

However, some collective nouns are always used with a plural verb:

By and large the police do a good job.

If you are unsure about whether to treat a collective noun as singular or plural, look it up in the dictionary. If you see the words 'treated as pl.' in brackets before the definition, this tells you that you should always use a plural verb with that particular noun.

Plural nouns treated as singular

Some plural nouns are treated as singular, in all or in certain meanings. These include the names of branches of knowledge or science, such as acoustics and mathematics, activities such as billiards and gymnastics, and diseases such as measles:

Acoustics is taught as part of the extended course.
The figures show that measles is on the increase.

If you are uncertain, check in the dictionary, which will tell you if a word of this type is 'treated as sing. or pl.' or 'treated as sing.'

You will also find that some other plural nouns, such as data and media (which are Latin plural forms), are now often treated as singular. Data is a special case. In scientific writing data is usually treated as a plural:

The data were tested for reliability.

However, in everyday use, it is acceptable to treat data as a singular, with a singular verb:

Raw data by itself is of no value to the business decision-maker.

Some plural words that have come into English from other languages have developed singular meanings, for example graffiti (from Italian, in which the singular is graffito):

The furniture had been damaged and graffiti was daubed on the walls.

▶ Punctuation

The purpose of punctuation is to make your writing easy to understand, by making the structure of continuous writing clear and showing how words relate to each other. The following is an example of how punctuation can change the meaning of what you write:

Not a circular. The owner must read.

Not a circular the owner must read.

The meaning of the first sentence is that the letter is not a circular and it must be read by the owner, while the second sentence is saying that the letter is a circular but that the owner does not have to read it!

Even the use of hyphens can change the meaning of what you say: consider the difference between a great-aunt (who is the aunt of your mother or father) and a great aunt (who may be very large, important, or excellent).

This section gives practical guidance on how to use punctuation accurately and in a way that makes the meaning of your writing easy to grasp. It's divided into units dealing with the major types of punctuation so that you can go straight to the areas in which you need guidance if you wish.

Full stop

The main use of the full stop is to mark the end of a sentence, however long, that is a complete statement:

My name's Beth and I was 18 in July.

I am sceptical about in-car navigation aids, partly because I think that display screens and electronic voices are distracting for drivers, partly because some early attempts were hopeless when it came to things like pedestrian areas.

The full stop is also used to mark the end of a group of words that is not a conventional sentence: this stylistic effect is often used for emphasis in literature or newspapers:

London. Implacable November weather.

Full stops are also used after some abbreviations, for example etc., Dec., or p.m. Note that if an abbreviation with a full stop comes at the end of a sentence you do not need to add another full stop:

Bring your own pens, pencils, rulers, etc.

Comma

The role of the comma is to give detail to the structure of sentences and to make their meaning clear by grouping or separating words. It usually represents the natural breaks and pauses that you make when speaking, and can be used to mark off phrases or words. However, many people are uncertain about the use of commas, often sprinkling them throughout their writing without knowing the basic rules. Here are the main cases when you should use a comma:

- To separate items in a list

  We sat down to eggs, bacon, and fried tomatoes.

The final comma before and (called the serial comma), is not essential and is not used by all writers or publishers: this dictionary does include one.

■ To introduce or end direct speech

'Yes,' he said, 'and I always keep my promises.'

■ To separate clauses in a sentence

A clause is a group of words in a sentence that has its own verb. If the clause makes sense on its own, it is called a main clause (e.g. we went back to work in the first example below). If the clause depends on the main clause to make sense it is known as a subordinate clause (e.g. having had lunch in the first example below). See page 9 in the Grammar section for more information about clauses.

Having had lunch, we went back to work.

She decided to take the company to an employment tribunal, but they paid a week before the hearing.

You should use a comma before and after a clause beginning with 'who', 'which', or 'whom' that adds extra and non-essential information to a sentence (known as a non-restrictive relative clause: see page 10 of the Grammar section):

Mary, who has two young children, has a part-time job in the library.

But do not use a comma if the clause beginning with 'who', 'which', or 'whom' is necessary to understand the meaning of the sentence:

Passengers who have young children may board the aircraft first.

■ To separate a part of a sentence that is an optional 'aside' or not part of the main statement

Using a pair of commas to isolate part of a sentence indicates that the information within the commas is not essential to the general meaning of the sentence.

Gunpowder is not, of course, a chemical compound.

His latest film, Calypso Dreams, opens next month.

Consider this sentence:

Cynthia's daughter, Sarah, is also a midwife.

If you rewrite it without commas the meaning changes:

Cynthia's daughter Sarah is also a midwife.

The absence of commas indicates that the name 'Sarah' is crucial to the understanding of the sentence. It shows that Cynthia has more than one daughter, and so the name of the one that is a midwife needs to be specified for the meaning to be clear.

Words in action

If you are uncertain about whether you have used a pair of commas correctly, try replacing them with brackets or removing the information enclosed by the commas altogether, and then see if sentence is still understandable.

■ To follow 'however'

when however means 'by contrast' or 'on the other hand':

However, a good deal of discretion is left in the hands of area managers.

! Do not use a comma after however when it means 'in whatever way' or 'regardless of how':

However you look at it, existing investors are likely to lose out.

Semicolon

The main role of the semicolon is to highlight a break that is stronger than a comma but not as final as a full stop. It is used between two main clauses that balance each other and are too closely linked to be made into separate sentences:

The road runs through a beautiful wooded valley; the railway line follows it.

You can also use a semicolon as a stronger division in a sentence that already contains commas:

What has crippled me? Was it my grandmother, frowning on my childish affection and turning it to formality and cold courtesy; or my timid, fearful mother, in awe of everyone including, finally, me; or was it my wife's infidelities, or my own?

Colon

There are three main uses of the colon:

- Between two main clauses in cases where the second clause explains or follows from the first:

  That is the secret of my extraordinary life: always do the unexpected.

- To introduce a list:

  The price includes the following: travel to London, flight to Venice, hotel accommodation, and excursions.

- Before a quotation:

  The headline read: 'Nuclear scientist goes missing'.

Apostrophes

Many people are unsure about when to use apostrophes: the best way to get them right is to understand when and why they are used. There are three main instances:

- To show possession

Use an apostrophe to show that a thing or person belongs or relates to someone or something: instead of saying the book of Sara or the weather of yesterday, you can write Sara's book and yesterday's weather.

- with a singular noun or most personal names, add an apostrophe plus s: Sara's book; the cat's paws; yesterday's weather.
- for personal names that end in -s, add an apostrophe plus s when you would naturally pronounce an extra s in speech: Charles's house; Dickens's novels; Thomas's brother.

Note that there are some exceptions to this rule, especially in names of places or companies, for example: St Thomas' Hospital; Barclays Bank.

- for personal names that end in –s but are not spoken with an extra s, just add an apostrophe after the –s: Bridges' poems; Connors' sister.
- with a plural noun that already ends in -s, add an apostrophe after the s: a boys' school; two weeks' newspapers; the horses' stables.
- with a plural noun that does not end in -s, add an apostrophe plus s: the children's coats; men's clothing.
- the only case in which you do not need an apostrophe to show belonging is in the group of words called possessive pronouns: these are the words hers, its, ours, theirs, yours (meaning 'belonging to her, it, us, them, or you').

Words in action: its or it's

Remember that its (without an apostrophe) means 'belonging to it' (the dog wagged its tail), but it's (with an apostrophe) is short for 'it is' or 'it has' (it's cold outside; it's been a long day).

- To show that letters or numbers have been omitted
  - An apostrophe can show that letters have been omitted: for example, I'm (short for I am); he'll (short for he will); pick 'n' mix (short for pick and mix).
  - It also shows that numbers have been omitted, especially in dates: for example, the winter of '89 (short for 1989).
- To show plurals of letters or numbers

Do not use an apostrophe for ordinary plurals of nouns such as pizzas, euros, cats, etc. However, some special plurals do need an apostrophe, usually to make their meaning clear:

- to show the plurals of letters or numbers, use an apostrophe before the s: there are two p's in appear; find all the number 7's.
- use an apostrophe to show the plurals of some very short words, especially when they end with a vowel: he was taken aback when the no's overwhelmed the yeses.

In the past people often used to put an apostrophe in plurals of abbreviations, such as MP's, or in dates made up of numbers, such as 1970's, but nowadays it is more usual to write them without: MPs; 1970s.

Hyphens

Hyphens are used to link words and parts of words. They are not as common today as they used to be, but there are three main cases where you should use them:

■ To join two or more words so as to form a compound word

The hyphen shows that the words have a combined meaning (e.g. a pick-me-up, mother-in-law, good-hearted) or that there is a relationship between the words that make up the compound: for example, rock-forming minerals are minerals that form rocks.

- With compound adjectives such as well known, you should use a hyphen when the compound comes before the noun (a well-known woman), but not when the compound comes after the noun (the woman is well known).
- Do not put a hyphen between an adverb ending in -ly and a linked adjective, even when they come before the noun: a highly competitive market; recently published books.
- Hyphens are often used to link words to avoid confusion (e.g. a great-aunt is not the same as a great aunt); this happens especially when a compound expression comes before a noun (e.g. twenty-odd people came to the meeting means something very different from twenty odd people came to the meeting).
- Do not put a hyphen between parts of verbs made up of more than one word (called phrasal verbs), such as build up in continue to build up your pension. However, when such a verb is made into a noun, such as build-up in a build-up of traffic, then you should use a hyphen.
- Use a hyphen when a compound formed from two nouns is made into a verb (e.g. a date stamp but to date-stamp).

■ To join a prefix to another word

- Hyphens can be used to join a prefix (such as pre-, ex-, or sub-) that ends in a vowel to another word, especially if that word itself begins with a vowel (e.g. pre-eminent or co-own), although one-word forms are becoming more usual (prearrange, cooperate). They are also used to join a prefix to a proper name (half-Italian).
- Use a hyphen to avoid confusion with another word: for example, to distinguish re-cover (= provide something with a new cover) from recover (= get well again)

■ To show word breaks

Hyphens can also be used to divide words that are not usually hyphenated for the following reasons:

- to show where a word is to be divided at the end of a line of writing. Always try to split the word in a sensible place, so that the first part does not mislead the reader: for example, hel-met not he-lmet; dis-abled not disa-bled.
- to stand for a common second element in all but the last word of a list, e.g. two-, three-, or fourfold.

Commonly confused words

There are many words in English which look or sound alike but have quite different meanings, for example pour and pore or flaunt and flout. These words are very easy to confuse and most spellcheckers will not be able to help in those situations in which one word of a pair has been spelled correctly but used in the wrong context.

The following list provides a quick-reference guide to the differences between pairs of words that regularly cause problems. The words in the list follow the accepted British English spelling; alternative American spellings can be found at the relevant words within the main dictionary.

1.2 The right word for the right situation: different levels of language

People use many different varieties of English, depending on the situation and on the purpose of what they are saying or writing: the type of language used, for example, in a business report would be quite different from that used in a letter or email to a friend. For example, if you were writing in a formal or technical situation, you might say that a machine was malfunctioning. In everyday use, you'd be more likely to say that it's not working, and in an informal situation (e.g. with friends or workmates) you might say that it's bust or kaput.

No type or style of vocabulary is intrinsically better than another. The important thing is to choose language that is appropriate to the occasion in which it is being used, whether you are composing a job application letter, a speech, or an article for a newsletter. The technical term for a particular level of language use (such as formal or informal) is register. Register is not the same as accent or dialect: a person with a strong regional accent may speak standard English and anyone, whatever their accent, may use the latest street slang.

This section offers a guide to the different levels of English and gives guidance about choosing the right level for different situations and contexts.

Standard English

Unless otherwise stated, the words and senses in this dictionary are classed as standard English. Standard English is generally appropriate in most written and spoken situations: you will find it particularly in mainstream broadcast and printed material.

The advantages of using the everyday vocabulary of standard English are that it provides the clearest, simplest, and most accessible use of the language and it enables you to get your message across effectively to the widest range of people. It is also more permanent than some other forms of language, such as slang, which often go out of use or fashion from one generation to the next.

Other levels of language (for example, formal, informal, or technical language) tend to contain more vocabulary that is used particularly by specific groups of people. From computer jargon to teenage slang, these forms of language signal that the speaker or writer belongs to a particular group and make understanding more difficult for non-members.

Formal language

Formal language tends to be found in academic journals and in official documents or notices, where it brings an added seriousness to the subject. Here are some examples of formal words with their equivalents in standard English:

FORMAL	STANDARD ENGLISH	FORMAL	STANDARD ENGLISH
cogitate	to think deeply	opine	to state an opinion
appellation	a name or title	abode	a home
penurious	poor	beverage	a drink

Using formal language in everyday situations may make your writing sound pompous or obscure. There is also the danger of creating an unintentionally amusing effect, as many writers deliberately use formal language for this purpose. Even in formal situations, such as a business report or presentation, it is best to be sparing in the use of this type of vocabulary.

Formal writing is not only characterized by its vocabulary. The sentences tend to be longer and more complex, featuring a greater use of the passive than standard English. Using the passive creates a more impersonal effect:

> It was found that the drug could cause heart attacks.
> [rather than: They found that the drug could cause heart attacks.]

Or:

> Staff were asked to volunteer for a 10 per cent pay cut.
> [rather than: The company asked staff to volunteer for a 10 per cent pay cut.]

As with formal vocabulary, it is best to avoid overusing passive verbs in everyday contexts, as you may make your writing sound over-formal, remote, or too complicated.

Informal language

Informal language, sometimes called slang or colloquial language, is used more in conversation than in writing (apart from emails and texting), especially among people who know each other well, or by particular social groups (such as teenagers) or people in particular occupations (such as the army). As a rule, it is best to avoid this type of vocabulary in most formal written contexts: it would be unwise to use it in job applications, for example, or in a business report. Informal language also includes taboo language (called vulgar slang in this dictionary). This typically refers to sex or bodily functions and should generally be avoided as it is likely to cause offence.

Much informal vocabulary is short-lived and relatively few words and uses pass into standard English: for instance, informal words for 'excellent' are being coined all the time, but many of them will never become sufficiently well established to be recorded in a dictionary. Informal vocabulary can also date very quickly: words such as spiffing or tickety-boo, for example, sound very old-fashioned today.

Apart from vocabulary, informality is also conveyed by the use of contractions (in which words are shortened by leaving out letters, as in they're, it's and he'll); short sentences; active verbs, non-standard spelling (e.g. wanna rather than want a or want to); and omitting the subject of a sentence (e.g. Just got an email from New York!).

Old uses and literary language

Some expressions which were once common are no longer in ordinary use but remain in our stock of words. Today, they are often used to give a deliberately old-fashioned effect, for example in historical novels, or to amuse people. This dictionary distinguishes between expressions classified as old use, which have generally not been in everyday use for a century or more (e.g. fain or bedchamber), and those that are dated: these may still be used occasionally, especially among older people or in writing from the past, such as gramophone (a record player) or rum (odd or peculiar).

Some words are found chiefly in literature or poetry written in an elevated style, such as slay, dolorous, or eve. This type of language is also found in the media, where it is often used to create a dramatic or otherwise heightened effect.

The table below lists some standard English words together with their equivalents in three different registers.

STANDARD	INFORMAL	FORMAL	OLD/LITERARY USE
attractive, good-looking	dishy, fit, foxy, drop-dead gorgeous		beauteous, comely, fair, pulchritudinous clothes, clothing	clobber, duds, gear, glad rags, togs	apparel, attire, garments	habiliment, raiment, vestments
criminal	baddy, crook, hood	malefactor	knave, cutpurse
die	kick the bucket, pop one's clogs, snuff it, peg out	decease	perish
drunk, intoxicated	legless, tight, plastered, smashed	inebriated
house, home	gaff, pad, crib	abode, domicile, dwelling, habitation, residence
praise	big up	laud	magnify, panegyrize
walk	mosey, toddle, pootle	perambulate

Consider the reactions you might get in the following situations as a result of using a word from an inappropriate register:

[in an email to a friend]
She's really friendly and funny, not to mention pulchritudinous.

[in a letter to an insurance company]
I returned from Canada to find that my gaff had been broken into.

Dialect

A dialect is a non-standard form of language that is used in a particular local region. Examples of English dialects are Geordie (from NE England, especially Tyneside) and Scouse (from Liverpool). It is best to avoid regional terms in formal writing as people from another part of the country may not understand them, although of course it is perfectly acceptable to use them when speaking to people from your own area.

Section 2

Practical Writing

The previous section provided information and advice on improving your general writing skills and your knowledge of the basics of good English. This section will show you how to put these skills into practice in various 'real-life' situations, giving examples of how to write letters, invitations, reports, and emails.

Applying for a job includes a detailed section on writing CVs/résumés, giving advice about what to include in your CV/résumé and how to set it out in the most effective way. The section on job application letters will help you to write a well-structured covering letter that will enable a potential employer to gain a favourable first impression of your abilities and experience.

Writing skills at work gives guidelines on how to write work-related letters, reports, and memos. It is very important to write good, clear English in work or business situations so that colleagues do not have to waste time trying to understand what you mean.

General correspondence gives advice on writing clearly and informatively in a variety of situations, including replying to invitations, making an insurance claim, or writing a letter of complaint.

Email guidelines gives practical advice on the type of language to use when writing emails in formal situations, such as contacting a professional organization or a potential employer.

Applying for a job

If you are applying for a job, you will generally be asked to send in your CV/résumé, together with a letter (or email) of application. A CV (curriculum vitae), also called a résumé, is a brief account of your previous employment, education, and qualifications. Employers may receive hundreds of applications for every job: your chances of success will be greatly improved if you are able to write a good CV that sets out your personal information in a succinct, focused, and structured way, accompanied by a well-written and relevant letter of application.

Writing CVs/résumés

Before beginning to draft your CV, make sure you have all the relevant information to hand, such as the dates you gained your qualifications and the beginning and end dates for the jobs you have done in the past. It is also important to approach the people you hope will act as your referees to confirm that they are happy to provide a reference for you.

Read the advert carefully to familiarize yourself with the specific requirements of the job you are applying for. It will create a good impression with the prospective employer if you tailor both your application letter and your CV to the job in question, focusing on relevant qualifications or aspects of your experience.

An effective CV should be clear and well structured, with a limited number of main sections. This will enable an employer to pinpoint the information they are looking for quickly and easily.

- Always begin with your personal details:
  - name
  - address
  - telephone number (home/mobile)
  - email address (personal rather than work)
  - personal profile

It is not necessary to include your date of birth, your marital status, or your nationality unless the job advert has specifically asked you to do this.

A personal profile is a brief summary outlining who you are and why you are a good employment prospect: it offers a good opportunity to tailor your CV to the requirements of a particular job before you move on to the details of your experience or qualifications.

- Employment history: begin with your current job and give a brief account of your role and responsibilities, particularly those which are most relevant to the post for which you are applying. Then work backwards through any other jobs you have held, giving a brief summary of each. It is not necessary to go into great detail about these previous positions unless you wish to highlight an aspect that is relevant to your current application. Unless you are very young, or you are applying for your first main job, it is also not necessary to list all the less important posts you may have held (such as summer jobs): it is acceptable to summarize these as, for example, 'various temporary administrative posts'.

! Avoid leaving unexplained gaps in your employment history, as this can give a negative impression or raise questions in an employer's mind. It is better to add a sentence explaining any periods which are not accounted for, for example you may have been bringing up young children or you may have taken a gap year. If you were unemployed for a time, try to treat this in a positive way by listing any initiatives you may have undertaken, such as gaining IT skills or doing voluntary work.

- Educational qualifications: start with the highest level of qualification and the place where you received it. So, if you have completed further education, this should come before your secondary school education in your CV. Unless the employer has specifically asked for them or they are relevant to the job in question it is not usually necessary to give details of all GCSEs or equivalent qualifications: the number and the grades achieved is usually sufficient.

- Any other skills, achievements, or training: if you have undertaken any relevant courses or training, list these now. These might include IT qualifications or proficiency in a foreign language.

- Interests or pastimes: a brief overview of your interests or hobbies will help to give your potential employer an insight into the type of person you are. Most people include this information on their CVs although it isn't obligatory.

- Referees: the final part of the CV should always be the names, titles, and contact details of people who would be willing to give a reference for you. Ideally you should provide one from your current (or most recent) place of work, while the second could be from a previous employer. If you are applying for your first job you could use a tutor, teacher, or anyone (apart from your family) who knows you well enough to vouch for your character.

General points

- Length: try to keep your CV as brief as possible (one to two sides of A4 paper), although the length will obviously depend on how old you are and how many jobs you have had. Remember that a CV should provide a clear, concise overview and that excessive detail should be avoided.

- Style: keep to brief, informative sentences, short paragraphs, and standard English. When you describe your responsibilities or achievements, it creates more impact if you begin with an action verb, such as teaching, leading, or developing in the example CV on the following page.

- Layout: today, most people write their CVs on a computer. It is better not to use a lot of different typefaces: keep to one or two that are clear and easy to read. Use bullet points to highlight key points, but don't try to liven your CV up with inappropriate colours, photos, or graphics.

- Checking: read your CV very carefully before you send it, paying particular attention to spelling and grammar. Many employers routinely discard those that contain such errors.

- Updating: keep your CV on file so that it can be updated as necessary. When applying for a job, review your CV to see how you can tailor it to match the needs of the advertised post.

Job application letters and emails

When applying for a job it is usual to include a covering letter with your CV. This letter gives you the opportunity to say why you want the job and it also forms a prospective employer's first impression of you, so it is vital to get it right. You may be asked to submit your application electronically, in which case the covering letter will take the form of an email.

Here are some general guidelines to help you draft an effective covering letter:

Preparation

Before you start your covering letter:

- Read the advert closely. If you study the requirements you will then be able to tailor your application, including the relevant information and omitting details of skills not specifically asked for.
- Think about why you want the job. This will focus your mind so that you can outline your reason for applying in a concise and coherent way.
- Find out what you can about the organization, e.g. on the Internet (including their own website if they have one) or in the press. If you can show that you have some knowledge of the organization it shows prospective employers that you are interested in them. It will also stand you in good stead if you are called for an interview.

Composing the letter

Style and content

- Keep it brief: you do not need to give a full record of your life to date. What you are aiming for is a clear explanation of your suitability for the post.
- Keep it coherent: make sure your letter or email follows a logical sequence.
- Keep it relevant: check that you are not including details which are irrelevant or superfluous. If something isn't relevant, leave it out.
- Avoid inappropriate language: your letter or email should be in standard English (see The right word for the right situation on page 20) and you should avoid the use of slang or jargon.
- Check that your grammar and spelling are correct: read what you have written very carefully and do not rely solely on your computer's spellchecker. Nothing will put off a prospective employer more than a letter full of careless spelling or grammatical errors.

Structure

The usual order of a job application letter is as follows:

- heading/position applied for
- current job or other situation
- reasons for wanting advertised job
- closing statement/signature

Heading or first paragraph

Give the title of the job you are applying for as a heading, or refer to it in the first paragraph of the letter. This ensures that your letter will go directly to the correct person within the organization. It is also a good idea to mention where you saw the job advert (or who told you about it, if it was someone already working for the organization).

Current situation

Next, state your current situation. If you are working, describe your job and the company that you work for. There is no need to go into too much detail: just give a brief outline of what your job entails. You should pick up on the job requirements outlined in the advert and focus on any of your current skills or responsibilities that correspond to those requested. For example, if the advert states that management skills are essential, then you should state briefly what management experience you have in your present job.

Reasons for wanting advertised job

You can now lead into why you want this job. Your reasons should appear positive, for example you feel that you are ready for greater challenges, more responsibility, or a change of direction. It is also important to say what you feel you would be able to bring to the job or organization.

Closing statement/signature

End the letter with a short closing paragraph: you could say when you would be able to start work or perhaps suggest that the company keep your CV on file if they decide that you are not suitable for the current job. Remember to sign your letter (people often forget to do this) and always include your typed name underneath your signature.

When you have finished writing your letter or email, read it a couple of times, firstly for logical order and the relevance of the information, and secondly for grammar and spelling.

Layout

Set out your information in a clear and attractive way. You can write your letter in traditional paragraphs or, if you prefer, you could use bullet points. Nowadays nearly all letters are written on a computer; use clear and conventional typefaces, picking out the heading in bold.

Occasionally an advert may request a handwritten letter; if this is the case you must ensure that your writing is neat and, above all, legible.

Here is an example of a covering letter for the CV/résumé shown on page 27:

12 Clover Way

The Recruitment Officer
Partington Borough Council
Partington
Manchester
M31 4FY

Dear Sir or Madam

Vacancy for Social Worker (Children's Services), Partington Borough Council

I am writing in reply to your advert for the above post, which appeared in The Guardian on 9 May 2008, and I attach my CV for your attention.

As you will see from my CV, I am currently studying for a BA (Hons) in Social Work at Thames University, Swindon, and will be graduating in June 2008. Successful completion of this degree will give me fully qualified social worker status with the GSCC. As an experienced primary school teacher I have a real enthusiasm and flair for working with children and wish to transfer the interpersonal, communication, and motivational skills that I gained in my teaching posts to a new career in social work. In addition, I have a long-standing interest in developing children's potential with regard to sporting activities, and am currently the manager of an under-11s football team.

I feel that as a social worker, I can make a real difference to the lives of the children and families of your area; I would also welcome the chance to work for a local authority such as your own, where I would be part of a small and committed team. One of my work placements during my degree course was with a local authority of a similar size, so I am familiar with working in this type of environment.

I look forward to hearing from you in the near future.

Yours faithfully

Charles Morton

Speculative job applications

If you know that you want to work for a particular company but have not seen an advert for a suitable vacancy, you can submit a speculative job application. This will consist of your CV, tailored appropriately to the type of job you are interested in, together with a covering letter of application.

Writing skills at work

Business letters

When writing an official business letter it is important to keep your tone and language formal. However, 'formal' does not mean pompous or obscure: use words with which you are familiar and avoid old-fashioned expressions such as Please find enclosed herewith .... or Be advised that .... You should also avoid technical phrases or jargon, particularly abbreviations, unless you are certain that the person you are writing to will understand them.

The opening

Start your letter with the greeting Dear Mr (or Mrs, Ms, etc.) Surname. If you don't know the name or the sex of the person you are writing to, begin with Dear Sir or Madam. Obviously if you know the person well and have a close working relationship with them it's perfectly appropriate to address them by their first name.

The content

- Setting the scene: it is important to begin with a heading alerting the reader to the subject of your letter. As well as the heading, your opening sentence should also set the scene. For example, In reply to your query concerning ... or Thank you for your letter of ... This also focuses the reader's attention on the matter you will be discussing.

- The main purpose: this is the part that conveys the reason for your letter. You should introduce your main point as early as possible: do not go into lengthy explanations before stating your purpose. Your aim is to communicate your request, proposal, or information in a clear and concise way. Once your purpose has been made clear you may want to give more details, perhaps adding some further background or facts.

- Winding down: before the end of a business letter, it is usual to provide a brief summary of your expectations or of what you foresee as the possible outcomes. For example, I realize that you will be disappointed by this decision ...., I hope we can meet shortly to discuss this issue...., I look forward to hearing from you.

The close

The wording at the end of a business letter follows a standard format:

If you know the name of the person you are writing to you should end your letter with Yours sincerely. If your letter begins with Dear Sir or Madam it should end with Yours faithfully. Your own name should be typed out underneath your signature, together with your position (if any).

Checks

When you have finished the letter read it through and ask yourself:

- Is your letter clear and concise?
- Will your reader understand all the words and terms you have used?
- Is your letter free of spelling or grammatical mistakes?

Dear Ms Manson

Proposed Garden Project

As you are aware from our last meeting, the Hogarth Tenants' Association is keen to establish a garden area in the gap site created by the demolition of the garages.

I am writing to enquire whether the County Council would be able to provide any funding for this venture or if there are any grants available for such a scheme.

The tenants' committee has assembled a group of volunteers to undertake this project but would welcome advice on how best to set about the task. Would it be possible for someone from the Parks Department to attend our next meeting to give the team the benefit of their experience?

I look forward to hearing from you.

Yours sincerely

Memos

Memos have always played an important part of business correspondence: as with letters it is important to convey the purpose of your communication as soon as possible and to structure your information in a logical and concise way. Memos tend to be more direct and less conversational than letters: the aim is to convey information between colleagues as concisely as possible. It's often helpful to set out a memo in very short paragraphs or bullet points so that the recipient can grasp the information as quickly as possible.

Nowadays an office memo is likely to take the form of an email: here's an example:

To: AcRefSales Sent: Mon 10/03/08 15.05

Subject: Sales Managers' Meeting

There will be a Sales Managers' meeting at 11.30 am on Friday 14 March in the Main Conference Room.

Would each manager please ensure that they bring their year-end sales figures and their projections for the following fiscal year.

Many thanks

Writing Reports

Report-writing is an important aspect of business life. You may be asked to prepare a report on a certain issue or you may yourself identify a concern or initiative that you wish to report on. The process of compiling a report will typically involve the collection of information or evidence, the evaluation of that information, and the presentation of the findings in an objective way. Most reports also offer recommendations for discussion or future action.

As with all written communication it is important to focus on the main purpose and to present a clear and concise account in a logical sequence. Remember that the reader needs to grasp the main points quickly and easily, so avoid very long sentences and keep to standard English as far as possible. If you are writing a report for a general audience, always explain any technical terms that you use.

Structuring a report

As a guide, most reports can be broken down into the following sections (NB: you will not always need to include every section):

- Title and contents: base the title on the essentials of the brief you were given, and give your name and the date of the report.
- Introduction/terms of reference: state the details of the brief you were given or any other reason for writing the report.
- Procedure/method/methodology: describe your method of gathering information.
- Findings: present the outcome of your research in a succinct and logical way, making sure that you include enough information to demonstrate that you have investigated the matter thoroughly. You can summarize the opinions of people you have approached, present statistics in support of your points, or describe any other relevant research. It will help the reader if you organize these findings under further headings, subheadings, or numbered subsections. Use graphics or illustrations if appropriate.
- Conclusions: this section should sum up your assessment of the current situation, based on your findings.
- Recommendations: propose recommendations to be considered for future action, based on your conclusions.
- Appendices: this section, if used, should contain supporting data, any questionnaires used, etc.

! Once you have finished the report, always read it through to check for clarity and relevance, and to make sure that it does not contain any grammatical or spelling mistakes. Finally, check that any documents you are using to support your arguments are provided in the relevant appendices.

Here is an example of a well-structured, clear, and concise business report:

Report on Central Purchasing Policy

Matthew Nash
3 February 2008

Introduction

This report addresses branch managers' concerns with the central purchasing policy, which have arisen following a steady decline in regional sales. It has been suggested that the previous purchasing system be reintroduced to prevent a further drop in sales: this report will assess the current situation and make recommendations as to appropriate action.

Method

Interviews were carried out with each of our 20 branch managers within the last month. They were questioned as to their objections to the central policy and asked to identify its main failings.

Research into our main competitors' practices and sales was also undertaken by personal visits to stores and assessment of sales figures in the trade press.

Findings

1. Existing situation
The central purchasing policy was implemented in January 2006. It replaced the previous system whereby regional managers were responsible for purchasing and could select lines likely to appeal to customers in their area. Since the central purchasing policy was implemented there has been a steady reduction in regional sales (see Appendix A) and a subsequent demand from our branches to return to the previous system.

However, the central purchasing policy has proved to be efficient and cost-effective over the past year, especially in terms of reducing storage overheads (see Appendix B).

2. Branch managers' concerns
Interviews with managers indicated that dissatisfaction with the existing policy reached a peak after the Christmas 2007 period, when regional sales were significantly lower year-on-year as managers had predicted.

In every shop, managers highlighted lines that were previously stocked because they had a specific appeal for customers in their area but which had not been ordered by central purchasing this year because they were unlikely to do well across the country as a whole. Managers also reported that many customers had requested such lines, especially over the Christmas period. Conversely, there were many examples of stock received by branches which were of no interest to customers in their area and which subsequently remained unsold.

3. Competitors' practice
Visits to competitors' stores revealed that they all held stock with a regional appeal. A review of sales figures for these lines in the Monthly Trade Journal during the period July 2006 to January 2008 shows that we have missed out on a sizeable amount of revenue by not stocking such items. (Statistics are attached in Appendix C.)

Conclusions

While savings have been made, the existing situation is unsatisfactory and could seriously damage the company's market share if allowed to continue. Action should be taken to address managers' concerns and prevent a further decline in sales. There are three possible courses of action:

1. Continue with the central purchasing policy
2. Modify this system to address its drawbacks
3. Return to the former system of regional buying

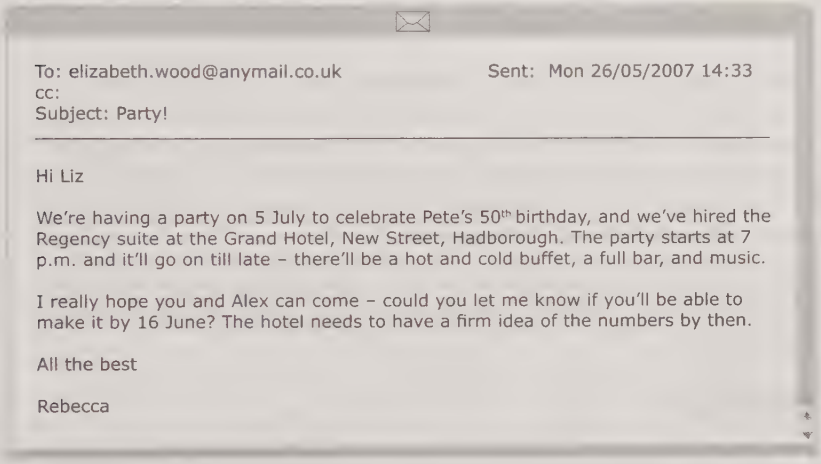
Recommendations

1. Given that the central purchasing policy, although cost-effective, has resulted in a decline in sales, it would appear that continuing with this system without modification is not advisable.
2. Consideration should be given to allotting regional managers a small proportion of the annual budget to allow them to buy in lines with known local appeal. This could be trialled and sales could be monitored for a fixed period, following which the situation could be reviewed again if necessary.
3. A return to the previous system of regional buying would seem undesirable, given that the central purchasing policy is both efficient and cost-effective.

General correspondence

In many everyday situations you can deal with people by phone, but there are some cases in which you need to communicate in writing, especially when you need to keep a record of what has been said. This section covers writing and replying to invitations, as well as writing letters of complaint and those relating to insurance claims. If you follow these guidelines and examples, it will help you to convey what you want to say clearly and effectively. This in turn will increase the likelihood of receiving a positive response from the person you are writing to.

Invitations



Writing invitations

Formal invitations. If the invitation is a formal one, for example to a wedding or other important social occasion, you should use a style of address written in the third person (i.e. using a person's surname and title, and 'they' or 'their' rather than 'I', 'we', or 'our'). Give full details of where and when the event is taking place and who the person invited should reply to. For example:

Jon and Victoria Black request the pleasure of the company of Lesley and Mark Pearson
at the wedding of their daughter Isabella to Ben Shaw
on Saturday 5 July 2008
at St Margaret's Church, Great Newtown at 3.30 p.m.

R.S.V.P.
to Victoria Black
10 Scott Road
Great Newtown
NN2 61Q
Tel.: 01776 446783

Informal invitations. Informal invitations are often not written at all, but if you do decide to write to your guests or email them, remember to include full details of the time and location of the event, and always give them enough notice. Here's an example of an informal invitation to a birthday party:

To: elizabeth.wood@anymail.co.uk Sent: Mon 26/05/2007 14:33

Subject: Party!

Hi Liz

We're having a party on 5 July to celebrate Pete's 50th birthday, and we've hired the Regency suite at the Grand Hotel, New Street, Hadborough. The party starts at 7 p.m. and it'll go on till late – there'll be a hot and cold buffet, a full bar, and music.

I really hope you and Alex can come – could you let me know if you'll be able to make it by 16 June? The hotel needs to have a firm idea of the numbers by then.

All the best

Rebecca

Replying to invitations

When replying to an invitation you should follow the same style and tone as that used in the invitation itself.

If you have received a formal invitation written in the third person, you should also use the third person in your reply.

If you are accepting:

4 Lake Street
Oldtown
OL3 4JB

21 May 2008

Lesley and Mark Pearson thank Mr and Mrs Black for their kind invitation to the wedding of their daughter Isabella on 5 July 2008. They will be very pleased to attend.

If you are unable to attend:

4 Lake Street
Oldtown
OL3 4JB

21 May 2008

Lesley and Mark Pearson thank Mr and Mrs Black for their kind invitation to the wedding of their daughter Isabella on 5 July 2008, but regret that they will be unable to attend as a result of an existing family commitment.

If the invitation is informal, then you can be equally informal in your reply. You could email or phone the person, but make sure you thank them for inviting you whether you are able to attend or not!

In every case it is polite to reply to invitations promptly.

Letters of complaint

Sadly, most people will need to complain about poor goods or service at some point in their lives: your broadband connection might not work, the newly fitted double glazing might be faulty, or your holiday hotel might turn out to be shabby or dirty. Although many complaints can be sorted out by a simple phone call, others may need a written record of both the complaint and the response.

If you are writing to complain about something there are a few points you should bear in mind to ensure that the problem can be dealt with satisfactorily.

Preparation

Gather all your facts together before you start. It helps to have a record of any phone calls you may already have made to the company, or a note of any previous correspondence.

You will also need any relevant customer reference numbers, and (where appropriate) details of where and when goods were bought or work was completed or the date and location of a holiday etc.

Style and content of the letter

- First set out exactly what the problem is.
- Then include any other relevant information in a clear and concise way, making sure that you put it in a logical sequence. If you have a lot of information, it may be helpful to set it out in bullet points.
- Finally, say what action you wish the company to take, and when you expect them to have done this.

Remember that your letter should be factual and your tone firm, but you should never use abusive language, no matter how frustrated or angry you may feel!

The letters on the following pages give examples of how to complain about a faulty product, unsatisfactory work, and a holiday that didn't meet expectations.

Dear Sir or Madam

RE: EasyIron Electric Iron (Model no: 2279)

I bought the above iron from The Electrical Store in Newford on 10 October 2005. On using it for the first time, I found that the temperature control was faulty; it was not possible to set it for any temperature apart from the highest (cotton).

When I returned the iron to the store, they said that they were unable to replace it or offer me a refund, but that it could be sent away for repair. As I need an iron on a daily basis, and it was not clear how long the repair would take, this option was unsatisfactory. As the iron clearly does not function as it should and therefore does not comply with the legal standards of product quality, I am writing to you to ask for a full refund of the price (£35.99).

I look forward to hearing from you within the next fortnight.

Yours faithfully

Fiesta blackout roller blind

I am writing to complain about the faulty installation of the above blackout blind to my bedroom window. This was fitted by Mr Brand from your company on Monday 29 March. That same evening I discovered the mechanism was not working and that it was impossible to either raise or lower the blind.

I phoned your company the following morning and Mr Brand returned 3 days later to repair the fault. However, although the blind worked for the first few days after his visit, it then jammed once more. When I phoned again on 6 April to report this fault, I was told that no one would be available to visit me for two weeks.

As I regularly work at nights and this blind is the only means of blocking out daylight, it is vital that it is functioning properly so I can sleep during the day. I therefore would appreciate it if you would ensure that someone returns to replace the blind by the end of the week.

Yours sincerely

Dear Mr Black

Holiday Reference Number: CT2118M

Following our telephone conversation earlier today, I am writing to give details of my dissatisfaction with my holiday at the New Hotel, Los Christianos, Tenerife (10 to 18 August 2007) that I booked with your company for myself and my family.

My central complaint is that the hotel fell far short of the description in the brochure. We had booked two double en-suite rooms (numbers 213 and 214); although said to be four-star accommodation, the bedrooms were very cramped and the furnishings worn and dirty. In addition to this, the toilet was blocked in room 214 and the shower wasn't working in room 213. The hotel's grounds, described in the brochure as 'pleasant, tranquil, and spacious' were in fact bordered on two sides by a very busy main road, while the swimming pool was closed the entire week for repairs.

When we spoke to your representative (Tracey Mills), she promised to try to get the shower and toilet fixed but this took an unacceptably long time to happen – 3 days from when we first complained. I asked her to fill out a holiday report form detailing these issues and enclose a copy for your information, together with photos of the bedrooms and the hotel grounds.

As stated in my telephone call, I feel that we are due a full refund for this holiday as it failed to meet the description in the brochure, together with compensation to make up for the fact that our holiday was ruined. I look forward to hearing from you within the next fortnight.

Yours sincerely

Insurance claims

Before drafting your letter make sure that you have all the necessary details to hand. The letter should include the following information, set out clearly and concisely:

- your policy details and reference numbers: set these out prominently at the start of your letter
- what has been damaged or stolen
- how and when the event took place
- details of your contact with the police (e.g. a crime reference number) if appropriate.

The following letter shows you how to set out your claim:

Dear Sir or Madam

Insurance claim
Policy number: XSG 1788346 DOM

I am writing to make a claim on the above insurance policy for new wooden laminate for the kitchen floor, a venetian blind, and various items of kitchen equipment.

On Tuesday 23 October, the overflow pipe became disconnected from the storage tank which is directly above the kitchen area. When I returned from work that day the kitchen was flooded and the deluge had also damaged several items on the top of the units.

Fortunately the units themselves are unaffected but the wooden laminate flooring has warped and been severely discoloured by the water penetration. The window blind too is badly misshapen and has been stained by the water. The other items sustaining damage are an electric kettle, a toaster, a small blender, and an Alessi kitchen timer.

I have kept all of the above damaged goods for your inspection and I look forward to hearing from you.

Yours faithfully

Email guidelines

The huge growth in electronic communication in recent years has generated new forms of English with a vocabulary, grammar, and style more usually found in informal conversation than writing. The language of blogs, emails, and message boards often ignores the rules of punctuation, grammar, and spelling, and the use of non-standard abbreviations is common.

While such informality is acceptable between friends and people you know (including those people you might know 'virtually', as fellow members of a chatroom or newsgroup), it is not appropriate in more formal situations. If you are writing an email to a potential employer or a professional organization, for example, your email should have a similar style and tone to that of a business letter.

Here are some guidelines on sending more formal emails:

- Always fill in the subject line so that the person you are emailing can see straight away what the message is about.
- If it is the first time you have contacted this person by email, avoid using an informal or familiar opening (e.g. Hi or Hello). Use Dear Mr/Mrs/Ms/Dr etc. as you would do in a letter or, alternatively, omit the opening greeting altogether if you are not emailing a specific person.
- Use language that is clear, polite, and to the point. Use standard English vocabulary and spelling and avoid attempts at humour unless you know the person you are emailing: it is easy to create the wrong impression. Make sure your spelling and grammar are correct.
- Pause and think before you send the email. Emails are quick and convenient, but the very speed with which you can send them can also be a disadvantage. Writing a letter gives you time for reflection in a way that emails do not: be very careful not to hit 'send' until you have given your message due consideration, especially if you are annoyed or upset.
- On the practical side, if you have said that you are sending an attachment with your email, make sure that you have actually attached it.
- At the end of the email, always give your full name (rather than just your first name) if you are making a first approach. This may not be clear from your own email address.

Here is a sample message showing the tone and structure for a formal email:

I am a first-year student currently studying for a BSc (Hons) in Hotel and Restaurant Management at City University and I am very interested in the possibility of a period of work experience at one of your hotels in the summer of 2008.

I would be available for any 6-week period between 1 July and 20 September and would be happy to work in any region of the UK. As you will see from my attached CV, I have already worked part-time in several housekeeping, office, and food service posts and would welcome the opportunity to broaden my experience in these and other areas of the industry.

I feel sure that working for your organization, as a national chain with a high reputation, would enable me to build up my knowledge of a range of aspects of the hotel industry and stand me in good stead for my chosen career.

I can be contacted by email or on 01653 27890 (home) or 07789 667540 (mobile). I look forward to hearing from you.

Sunita Shah

! Finally, always remember that the informality of some electronic communication, whether it be a casual approach to grammar and punctuation or the widespread use of abbreviated forms, should never be carried over into formal writing.
